

Insurance for the medical practices sector

What are the key risks in the medical practices sector?

The medical practices sector is complex and diverse, with businesses ranging from pharmacies to allied health clinics and from medical practices to private hospitals.

Depending on the nature of your business and its set-up, some of the key risks you face could include liability for mistreatment of patients, lost patient results or incorrectly dispensed medication, as well as the potential for damage to be caused to your premises, equipment and other assets, or a data compromise attack.

Who should consider insurance?

Whether you're running a pharmacy, private hospital medical centre or allied health clinic, in an industry with complex risks where no two businesses are alike, a range of flexible and customised insurance covers are required to protect your business, staff, assets and patients.

Data

Medical data is between ten and twenty times more lucrative than credit card or banking details.

All health practitioners must have professional indemnity insurance that complies with the registration standard.

(Australian Health Practitioner Regulation Agency, Professional indemnity insurance arrangements, 2022)

In the event of a claim, both individual practitioners and the practice itself can be sued, so medical practices need their own insurance.

(TEGO, A guide to medical practice indemnity insurance, 2022)

"More than 5,700 community pharmacies in Australia dispense over 211 million prescriptions, with a value of $10.6 billion."

Case Study

One of the MRI machines at Susan's medical imaging practice broke down and was unable to be repaired. Unfortunately, due to supply chain issues it took over six months to get a replacement machine shipped and installed. However, as Susan had taken out business interruption cover as part of her business pack insurance, not only was the cost of the new machine covered, but Susan was also covered for lost income as a result of the outage.
